Alburn E. Breed Among Teachers In Special Study

During the summer months when public school classrooms are empty, many teachers return to colleges and universities throughout the nation to continue the important task of keeping up to date in their studies. This summer, for instance, Alburn E. Breed, 25 Hamilton Place, Clinton, is attending Colgate University and is enrolled in a special six-week program of study designed especially for teachers.

Teachers are constantly confronted with the problem of finding new and better ways of educating America's youth. Fortunately, universities such as Colgate recognize this need and organize special summer sessions to provide opportunities for advanced study and research. By enrolling in these intensified programs, teachers such as Mr. Breed can make maximum use of the few short weeks of summer vacation and thus help guarantee a brighter tomorrow for all the students they teach.

Officials at Colgate University report that teachers are often their best students. According to Dr. George E. Schlusser, Director of the Colgate Summer Program, teachers appreciate the opportunity to do everything possible to improve their classroom teaching. Moreover, Schlusser points out that there are many benefits to summer study. In addition to being able to do advanced work, teachers attending summer school have a chance to meet many new people with exciting ideas. The combination of study and shared ideas helps teachers grow professionally and helps them date their concepts of teaching.
