

Quinn's

Mrs. Bridget Foran Quinn, widow of Thomas Quinn, emigrated from the town of Geashill, near Dublin, Queens County (old name), in 1863. Her husband, said to be a school teacher, was killed while working in a sand pit. She traveled in a sailing ship with my father Thomas Foran Quinn and possibly some of her younger children. Some of her older children came to this country before her. She was six weeks on board the ship and apparently carried some of her provisions and her meals for herself and children were prepared on the top deck

There were the following children:

Prior to the Chicago fire, 1872, Father and Mother Quinn stopped in Chicago to visit Edward Quinn who was Father's Uncle. Edward was a Judge and had four daughters. A son who had been a soldier in the Civil War was killed in an accident on way home after discharge. One daughter is thought to have eloped with a man named Harmon.

John Foran Quinn used to tell yarns of his life in Ireland. At a wake he attended, where much "poteen" was imbibed the "late lamented", in his coffin, was stood up in a corner and a "hoedown" took place.

At another, he and others, tied a rope around the feet of the corpse, the other end being tied to a donkey outside the window. Straw was tied to the donkey's tail and the Devil ran away with the remains.

Note: Having known my Uncle, I can believe these yarns.

When Thomas Foran Quinn arrived in New York he worked as an apprentice to his Uncle Michael Foran who has a store. Michael Foran had a son also, name unknown. Years later John F. Quinn was unable to obtain any information other than that some people in the neighborhood recalled the Forans.

There was a Mrs. James Carroll who lived in Franklin Springs who Thomas Foran called "Aunt Rose."

There were Quinns and O'Hanlon's or Hanlons in Utica whom, Bartholomew claimed were relatives.
